

I really like the Privacy Act. It is peaceful at night at home. I don't do any business over the phone. However, before the Privacy Act, people would still call -- even if when I told them I didn't do business over the phone. They would call several nights in a row. In addition, I love going home and if I have phone messages -- someone has left a message. Before the privacy act, I would have 6 - 10 hangups.

e.g., I filled out a Discover Card application and got denied. The same day I received the denial letter, Discover people called me to solicit for a new card. That is very frustrating.

e.g., My parents are retired and don't understand the phone calls. They intimidate my parents into thinking someone is watching them or trying to take their money.

I think this has been a very successful piece of legislation and should not be over turned.
